As a part of my continuing effort to bring government accountability and transparency on the new health care reform to as many people as possible, I will hold a health care town hall on April 3, 2010 at Collenbrook United Church.

Health Care is the most personal of any public policy and it is understandably evokes profound emotion, as we have seen throughout the current debate. While I believe that the reform the president signed into law last week will strengthen our nation and extend health care to millions of families, the effort of getting to this point has been long and difficult, and at times the process and the debate fell short of what Congress owes the American people. This event, others like it, and the services I will continue to provide to my constituents are an effort to reestablish people's faith in their national institutions as we look to the future of America, together.

At home in the 7th Congressional District, I have regularly conducted open forums on various aspects of health care. Since early 2007, I have hosted a series of outreach events to provide my constituents with all available resources and information about the issues that affect themselves and families. In regards to health care reform I have hosted a total of 10 town halls, tele-town halls and summits to address my constituent's questions. I also made health care a principal focus at events including my Business Procurement Summit (Mar 2009-Springfield Country Club), Seniors Service Fair (Aug 2008-PSU Brandywine), and Working Families Resource Summit (August 2009-Interboro High School). To complement those efforts, I have dialed hundreds of thousands of phones in four sets of district-wide "tele-town halls" to take questions for over two hours each on matters of health care, energy, education, and national security. Most recently I have hosted the second Summit (February 2010-Interboro High School) and the 4th

Working Families Resources

Veterans Summit (March 2010-Ridley High School) where organizations provided resources for health, networking, and jobs.

It is my responsibility to listen and address concerns, and now to help explain the facts of the legislation and how it will help the good people of the 7th Congressional District. C
